Civic Plaza Art Panels

Eighty youngsters recently painted the murals for the fence in front of the Civic Plaza Project construction site at 405 Vernon Street, future home of the City's multi-storied parking garage and Roseville Arts' Blue Line Gallery. The children used their imaginations and talent to illustrate the activities that will be taking place at the new parking garage and art gallery. The mural activity was one of several free activities offered by Roseville Arts' in this summer's Raley's Art Wine & Music Festival. NEC Electronics America and the Home Depot on N. Sunrise funded the project.

Historic District

Since late July, the project team has been hard at work bringing together all the elements necessary to begin the project. During this time, city departments and the project design team have been busy reviewing materials, products and technical submittals from the contractor. Simultaneously, the boring contractor is working on completing the three bores needed for the under-grounding of the overhead utilities. Because the Historic District is so old, the majority of the under-ground utilities do not have plans that show the location of the utilities. This slows the process because the crews don't know what they will encounter: Nevertheless, progress is being made.

With construction now underway the project team will provide regular updates to the business owners and residents in the District. The updates will come through regular construction bulletins and newsletters, as well as continual interaction with everyone in the District. Although the project will have its challenges, working together will reduce the impact of construction on businesses.
